The presentation, in my opinion, was quite instructive and full of information regarding the upcoming course that was both pertinent and correct. One of the first things I discovered was that this course doesn't cover much in terms of how to treat diseases. FNP590 merely provided the foundation for pharmacological management; FNP571, an advanced pharmacology course, provided the rest. Even though I knew 540 hours needed to be completed for the program, I think it's especially crucial to comprehend how these hours are split (135 per course; 17 per week). Such a portrayal of the criteria reinforces the idea that nursing is one of the few professions where schedules and deadlines must be scrupulously adhered to. Also, the visual representation of the corner navigation and review was very helpful in understanding how to efficiently manage the various instructional resources. The main obstacle that would force me to adjust my schedule for the second half of the program is the impossibility to complete clinical at the workplace where I currently work.

The current courses must ensure the advanced theoretical knowledge and practical skills in pharmacology, physiology and physical assessment. Thus, it must become a contribution to understanding the clinical experiences, potential directions for career growth and opportunities. Apart from the informational background, the communication with the groupmates and preceptors becomes a unique possibility to get a deeper insight into the real-life challenges that can occur throughout the teamwork. Family nurse practitioner clinical handbook is a solid basis for understanding and constructing the clear professional goals and objectives (US University, 2020). Thus, by the end of the course, I expect to understand my roles clearly and evidence-based patient-centered care to my patients either remotely or in person.
